Fourth of July – I know you're getting this newsletter after the 4th but – as always – it's still a good time to remind ourselves that after enjoying a great American tradition of barbecue with a beer or two, watching the fireworks or just sitting around the porch with your folks or however you celebrate; as Americans we also have great responsibilities for this country and for this nation. I believe these responsibilities include not just the ones written down by the Founding Fathers but also some not so obvious ones, that seem to be falling through the cracks during these times. I often bring up "politics" during family events and my wife used to give me the eye for it. Then I tell her I have to do this and she understands. I really think I have to talk about things happening around us, just to give them my two cents on things. My son is 16 and my daughter is 8 and I think it's really important that they know what their father's beliefs are. I'm not saying they have to follow me but I sure don't want them to rely on just peers' opinions or definitely not on mainstream medias. I feel I have to tell them that not everything was like this even just a few years back and they may draw their own conclusions about whether the change we're going through is for the better or worse, but at least they know my stand. And I'm hoping that somewhere down the line these values will become their own; these values that I believe are the "old" values, the American values. As a proud American, I think this is my responsibility, too. This is just one man's opinion.
God Bless America
